A Well Worn Tallis For

The tallit gadol (Yiddish/Ashkenazic Hebrew tallis godoil; traditionally known as tallét gedolah among Sephardim), or "large" tallit, is worn over one's clothing resting on the shoulders. This is the prayer shawl that is worn during the morning services in synagogue by all male participants, and in many communities by the leader of the afternoon and evening prayers as well.

The kippah (in Yiddish, yarmulke) is worn during prayer services by men, and has become optional for women as well in Reform, Conservative and Reconstructionist congregations. (In some Reform congregations, the kippah is also optional for men.) Jewish tradition does not require any specific type of head covering. A kippah can be worn conveniently under a street hat, as was the custom of most ...

In Eastern Europe, there were regional variations in Jewish dress, and as modernity approached, considerable local heterogeneity as well. In traditional men's dress, from at least the sixteenth century, styles were influenced by those of the Polish gentry (szlachta), which itself had borrowed many elements from Turkish and other Near Eastern dress.

Dear Jew In The City, Why don't Orthodox women wear pants even though in today's world you can tell women's and men's clothing apart? Thanks, Chelsea Dear Chelsea, What you're hinting at is one of the reasons why most Orthodox women don't wear pants: kli gever - the prohibition for a woman to dress like a man. (Beged isha is the corresponding prohibition on men dressing like women.)
